ORGANIC GARDENING SERIES

Meet OGS's New
Organic Living Blogger,
Ellen Rubenstein Chelms!

I'm as Organic as I Can Afford to Be

There are so many reasons to grow some food, and many of them are economic.

For one thing now that we're in the mountains we live on a sloping lot and it's not so easy, in fact it can be downright dangerous, to mow the lawn. But we have one. And pay someone to mow it for us. My husband still considers a beautiful green lawn a symbol of his success and a measure of his citizenship in its level of manicured tidiness.

Part of my agenda is to get rid of the grass, which I can't eat, and replace it with things I can. Little by little, over the last four years, I have covered patches of it with scraps of the metal roofing we installed a while back, then erected raised beds over the grass that died underneath them.

Volunteer Blog Posts are Up!

At this year's Spring Conference, we at OGS decided to set up a handful of volunteers with pen, paper, and the directive to go home after the event and write a post on each class they attended for us to share on the OGS Blog in a series we're calling the Conference Blog!

In this series, we bring together the diverse perspectives of our audience and hear experiences from dozens of different voices--commercial farmers, backyard growers, conscientious consumers, and everything in between!
